This study examined the respiratory toxicity of 4-hexylresorcinol (4HR), a new fragrance ingredient for use in scented products. Nontoxic high dose (100 mg/ml for 10 min) and toxic low dose (5 ml of 1%) of 4HR were given to female guinea pigs (n = 3 to 5) via intratracheal instillation. No deaths were recorded, but at 24 hr postexposure, breathing

Not.Q: How to handle escaped characters in text files, especially custom properties I've been writing some custom documents, and to some extent, they are more or less "another word processing app". At the same time, I've noticed that there is quite a gap when it comes to metadata. I have a file that provides a list of custom properties, intended as an annotation document. These properties are inserted into text files using the `\meta{property}` notation. You can enter whatever you want, and the text file is saved with these properties in the metadata. You can also extract them using keys and place them on the document when printing (or when editing). The problem is that the Mac OS X default text editor doesn't like that. When saving a text file, it converts all meta characters to ugly umlauts (ÃœÃ...). A screenshot is at the bottom of this question. The `\meta{property}` notation is a snippet from the standard file command, where `\meta{property}` is replaced by the property's name. Are there any tools or vim commands that can fix/manipulate these meta characters? I tried to use sed for this, but it didn't seem to work. Things to consider: The file also contains some "standard" properties that are also gathered from the text. (Text format, paragraph, page etc.). Those are not escaped. This all is for OS X, but even in windows it's somehow annoying

Screenshot of the problem A: When you edit a .tif file, you need to perform a regular expression replace (that's what the search and replace buffer is for, it says so in the menu), but be careful, there's a reason it says "regular expression" :). More specifically, for a given line, search for the expression: `\meta{(.)}\r\s*` and replace the whole line with: `\1` Which tells the editor to find everything matched by that expression, and replace it with one instance of what was in the expression. `(.)` says "find any number of characters that aren't the newline character", and `\r\s` says "find any number
