Ksitigarbha, or Subhodiputra, is one of the Forty Arhats or Asuras of Buddhism, who first renounced the life of royalty and became an ascetic. Ksitigarbha's story dates back to an era before Buddha's time. He was one of the most prominent Indian gods, and was often depicted as a grumpy dwarf with a pot belly.

Ksitigarbha was a guardian of Buddhist practitioners (particularly the dying), where he is said to have served those seeking release from the cycle of birth and death. Whilst on a mountain one day, Ksitigarbha was summoned by Asuras to save their capital called Kapilavastu. Ksitigarbha was able to kill the demon by blinding him with his mind. Before leaving he offered his breast to the demon thus becoming the patron saint of Breast-feeding babies. Although he had bested the demon, Ksitigarbha still had to confront all of his attackers a second time with the help of a great warrior who was a relative of his, and thereby ascended to a heavenly realm of his own.
